Synopsis

Medicine is often said to be both art and science - but how? In this talk, Ms Ching aims to widen our understanding of art, beyond traditional forms, to include the study of the humanities and social sciences. This study can be valuable in helping clinicians become better communicators and at navigating grey areas. Through formulating possibilities, the social sciences can be valuable in understanding scientific results and creating new research directions. By necessarily taking broader perspectives, it helps clinicians reconnect the dots between clinic and home, policy and management.
