Patient reported outcome measures (PROMs) are self-reported instruments that provide insights into a patient's perception of their health. PROMs are important as they can help to improve patient engagement, facilitate shared decision-making, and enable monitoring and screening, improving the overall quality of care and outcomes. However, despite benefits there is considerable international variation in the use and uptake of PROMs. This policy dialogue examines why PROMs matter, and how the use of PROMs can best be deployed in policy and practice to drive value and sustainability in healthcare.
